Recycle your wireless phone with evolvcom's PhoneAgain program.

Why you should do it. Simple — it's good for our planet, and the right thing to do. When wireless phones are recycled, component parts such as plastics and precious metals can be extracted and used in other products. Depending on their condition, phones can be reused, refurbished, or recycled.

Reused: If the phone is in good working condition, they can be donated to charity and reused by people in need.

Refurbished: Manufacturers can recondition or repair wireless phones and return them to the marketplace.

Recycle & Recover: If the phone is at the end of its useful life, they can be sent to processing facilities that recover and safely recycle any reusable materials.

What to do first. Before you can recycle your wireless phone, there are steps you should take to prepare:

- 1) Make sure you terminate your service, or transfer it to a new phone.
- 2) Delete the phone's memory of names, phone numbers, and other personal information (see your user manual for detailed instructions on how to do this).
- 3) Remove your phone's Subscriber Identity Module (SIM) card, if it operates on a network that uses one. If you're not sure whether your phone uses a SIM card, contact the manufacturer. For instructions on how to remove the card, consult your user manual.

Kerry, for complete information about the PhoneAgain program, including where to recycle your phone, visit www.evolvcom.com.au

Recycle your wireless phone with evolvcom's PhoneAgain program.

Why you should do it. Simple — it's good for our planet, and the right thing to do. When wireless phones are recycled, component parts such as plastics and precious metals can be extracted and used in other products. Depending on their condition, phones can be reused, refurbished, or recycled.

Reused: If the phone is in good working condition, they can be donated to charity and reused by people in need.

Refurbished: Manufacturers can recondition or repair wireless phones and return them to the marketplace.

Recycle & Recover: If the phone is at the end of its useful life, they can be sent to processing facilities that recover and safely recycle any reusable materials.

What to do first. Before you can recycle your wireless phone, there are steps you should take to prepare:

- 1) Make sure you terminate your service, or transfer it to a new phone.
- 2) Delete the phone's memory of names, phone numbers, and other personal information (see your user manual for detailed instructions on how to do this).
- 3) Remove your phone's Subscriber Identity Module (SIM) card, if it operates on a network that uses one. If you're not sure whether your phone uses a SIM card, contact the manufacturer. For instructions on how to remove the card, consult your user manual.

Ricky, for complete information about the PhoneAgain program, including where to recycle your phone, visit www.evolvcom.com.au

Recycle your wireless phone with evolvcom's PhoneAgain program.

Why you should do it. Simple — it's good for our planet, and the right thing to do. When wireless phones are recycled, component parts such as plastics and precious metals can be extracted and used in other products. Depending on their condition, phones can be reused, refurbished, or recycled.

Reused: If the phone is in good working condition, they can be donated to charity and reused by people in need.

Refurbished: Manufacturers can recondition or repair wireless phones and return them to the marketplace.

Recycle & Recover: If the phone is at the end of its useful life, they can be sent to processing facilities that recover and safely recycle any reusable materials.

What to do first. Before you can recycle your wireless phone, there are steps you should take to prepare:

- 1) Make sure you terminate your service, or transfer it to a new phone.
- 2) Delete the phone's memory of names, phone numbers, and other personal information (see your user manual for detailed instructions on how to do this).
- 3) Remove your phone's Subscriber Identity Module (SIM) card, if it operates on a network that uses one. If you're not sure whether your phone uses a SIM card, contact the manufacturer. For instructions on how to remove the card, consult your user manual.

Raymond, for complete information about the PhoneAgain program, including where to recycle your phone, visit www.evolvcom.com.au

Recycle your wireless phone with evolvcom's PhoneAgain program.

Why you should do it. Simple — it's good for our planet, and the right thing to do. When wireless phones are recycled, component parts such as plastics and precious metals can be extracted and used in other products. Depending on their condition, phones can be reused, refurbished, or recycled.

Reused: If the phone is in good working condition, they can be donated to charity and reused by people in need.

Refurbished: Manufacturers can recondition or repair wireless phones and return them to the marketplace.

Recycle & Recover: If the phone is at the end of its useful life, they can be sent to processing facilities that recover and safely recycle any reusable materials.

What to do first. Before you can recycle your wireless phone, there are steps you should take to prepare:

- 1) Make sure you terminate your service, or transfer it to a new phone.
- 2) Delete the phone's memory of names, phone numbers, and other personal information (see your user manual for detailed instructions on how to do this).
- 3) Remove your phone's Subscriber Identity Module (SIM) card, if it operates on a network that uses one. If you're not sure whether your phone uses a SIM card, contact the manufacturer. For instructions on how to remove the card, consult your user manual.

Recycle your wireless phone with evolvcom's PhoneAgain program.

Why you should do it. Simple — it's good for our planet, and the right thing to do. When wireless phones are recycled, component parts such as plastics and precious metals can be extracted and used in other products. Depending on their condition, phones can be reused, refurbished, or recycled.

Reused: If the phone is in good working condition, they can be donated to charity and reused by people in need.

Refurbished: Manufacturers can recondition or repair wireless phones and return them to the marketplace.

Recycle & Recover: If the phone is at the end of its useful life, they can be sent to processing facilities that recover and safely recycle any reusable materials.

What to do first. Before you can recycle your wireless phone, there are steps you should take to prepare:

- 1) Make sure you terminate your service, or transfer it to a new phone.
- 2) Delete the phone's memory of names, phone numbers, and other personal information (see your user manual for detailed instructions on how to do this).
- 3) Remove your phone's Subscriber Identity Module (SIM) card, if it operates on a network that uses one. If you're not sure whether your phone uses a SIM card, contact the manufacturer. For instructions on how to remove the card, consult your user manual.

Edward, for complete information about the PhoneAgain program, including where to recycle your phone, visit www.evolvcom.com.au

Recycle your wireless phone with evolvcom's PhoneAgain program.

Why you should do it. Simple — it's good for our planet, and the right thing to do. When wireless phones are recycled, component parts such as plastics and precious metals can be extracted and used in other products. Depending on their condition, phones can be reused, refurbished, or recycled.

Reused: If the phone is in good working condition, they can be donated to charity and reused by people in need.

Refurbished: Manufacturers can recondition or repair wireless phones and return them to the marketplace.

Recycle & Recover: If the phone is at the end of its useful life, they can be sent to processing facilities that recover and safely recycle any reusable materials.

What to do first. Before you can recycle your wireless phone, there are steps you should take to prepare:

- 1) Make sure you terminate your service, or transfer it to a new phone.
- 2) Delete the phone's memory of names, phone numbers, and other personal information (see your user manual for detailed instructions on how to do this).
- 3) Remove your phone's Subscriber Identity Module (SIM) card, if it operates on a network that uses one. If you're not sure whether your phone uses a SIM card, contact the manufacturer. For instructions on how to remove the card, consult your user manual.

Please have your bill with you when you call Member Services to discuss a specific call. This helps our representatives verify your identity and allows us to discuss specific calls with you. Before discussing a call on your bill, the Evolvcom representative will ask you to provide information, including the telephone number, date, and time of the call. You can find this information on the statement page where your calls are itemised. Thank you for choosing Evolvcom for your telecommunications needs
